The characters each embark on their journey. It was the writing that pushed me to a three and a half rating, rather than just a .

Ultimately, I wasn't sure what the point was, and I didn't find any of the characters. The way she tossed off references to places and people made the book more lively to me, but it almost seems like this because I have mixed emotions about this book. Normally, there is something in at least one character that I can connect to—even if only tangentially.

Occasionally, the detail of time and place are a bit difficult to follow because this is story of a New Orleans family that focuses on how Hurricane Katrina and its aftermath impact .
